Aumann Arena. Do you have some offbeat opinions that you want to try and test? Some beliefs that few others hold? Aumann's agreement theorem says that two agents acting rationally and with common knowledge of each other's beliefs cannot agree to disagree. LWCW16 brings together many people and lots of potential disagreement, offering a perfect opportunity to put Aumann's theorem to the test. We call this the Aumann Arena, where "Two beliefs enter; one belief leaves!" To join the fray, bring beliefs that others are likely to disagree with, and let them fight - to the death! (Or to a consensus arising from mutual updates on the sum of the evidence. We'll see.)

Productive Retrospective Coworking. It's the third day of the Community Weekend, and you have found a topic you want to think through, got inspired with a project to try, or just generally plan to follow up on the things you learned about during the past two days. We want to provide you with the space to get started.

Secular Sermons: One of Us. Extended and improved version of last year's meditation event. Should be pleasant and entertaining for all.

Software for Applied Rationality. Existing computer software that helps humans in other areas, can be adapted (in sometimes unexpected ways) to aid with learning rationality and applying it in daily life. Not only that, but also by thinking of brains as programmable computers, and of our lives as outputs of the programs that are executed by and uploaded into our brains, we can derive some useful techniques, some of which transfer directly from best practices in software development (such as using bugtrackers and version control systems). There is not much established research to be found in the area, so much of the content of the talk is heavily based on personal experimentation and anecdotal evidence, and as such is meant to be food for thought rather than rigorous science.

The Age of Em. A talk and a long Q&A session based on Robin Hanson's book "The Age of Em: Work, Love and Life when Robots Rule the Earth".

The Strategic Value of Emotions. How has altruistic ('selfless') behaviour managed to arise in an evolutionary context where only individual survival matters? In his 1988 book Passions Within Reason, the economist Robert H. Frank explores that question (and others) and offers an interesting theory born from an economic perspective.

Workshop: Clean and Dirty Pain. Emotional pain can be roughly divided into two categories, sometimes called 'clean pain' and 'dirty pain'. Clean pain is the immediate reaction to a painful event, and is usually relatively brief. It's the original discomfort we feel in response to a real-life problem. Dirty pain, in contrast, is the pain we get when we needlessly struggle to control, eliminate, or avoid clean pain. For many people, dirty pain makes up a much larger fraction of pain than clean pain does - which is ironic, given that dirty pain is by itself caused by attempts to reduce pain.

In this workshop, people will have a chance to examine and discuss the things that are currently emotionally difficult to them, see to what extent their difficulty is caused by clean or dirty pain, and learn techniques and mindsets for better dealing with dirty pain. Some participants in previous workshops have found this to be a very intense and heavy experience, but also one that has brought great relief to existing anxieties and sources of pain so been very much worth it. The amount of benefit you'll get out of the workshop is likely to depend on the amount of emotional pain you currently have in your life, as participants with little emotional pain they could think of have reported less benefit.

Workshop: Modular Origami. This is a nerdy and mathematically-oriented arts&crafts thingy that LWCW participants might find entertaining.
